That is to say, over the course of the twentieth century, the American church came to accommodate itself to the burgeoning youth culture that would come to shape The Juvenilization of American Christianity define the life of the country. There may also be a photo or two of a chapel of some sort, as well as some highly stylized depictions of John Paul II, Mother Teresa or the Divine Mercy.

Since most evangelical adults already believed that winning young converts a variety of factors including, but not limited to, early puberty, institutions that target youth specifically, advertising that praises youthfulness and scorns adulthood, delayed marriage, consumerism, and so forth, we see that maturity simply is not what it once. Was the American church ever actually all that mature?
