When the "Enemies of the Internet" list was introduced it listed 13 countries. In the US and UK, privately funded groups have also proliferated claiming to be able to tackle "fake news" and spot allegedly false accounts on social media, while sometimes obfuscating their own backers and agenda. Retrieved 2 June

At the same time it is made clear that by its very nature this right cannot be absolute. Critics of the new law fear it could restore censorship. Narratives about fake news and online harassment are so effective for lawmakers seeking to push internet censorship because the problems and concerns they claim to be tackling are very real.

There are several motives or rationales for Internet filtering: politics and a handbook of Internet politics. These include: patenting methods of doing business over the Internet, and exploiting existing content in new ways on the Internet; efforts by patent, trademark, and copyright owners to enforce their rights online, and to compel Internet firms to monitor their online offerings and remove or pay for any infringements of others' rights; and the ability of the law to require or prohibit Internet companies from creating a specific version of the Internet.
